Rôme-burh, -scot. v. Rôm, Rôm-gesceot.

Rôm-feoh; gen. -feós; n. Peter's pence. [William of Malmesbury attributes to Ethelwulf the institution of this tax: 'Ethelwulf went to Rome (v. Chron. 855) and there offered to St. Peter that tribute which England pays to this day,' bk. 2, c. 2; but in the earlier and similar payment by Offa, established in 787, may probably be seen the origin of the Rômfeoh in England, v. Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. 230. The Chronicle several times during Alfred's reign contains the notice that 'Wesseaxna ælmešsian' were sent to Rome, but the first notice in the laws of Rômfeoh occurs in the agreement between English and Danes, to which his son Edward was a party: 'Gif hwā Rômfeoh forhealde gylde lahsit mid Denum, wite mid Englum,' Th. i. 170, 2. The penalty, which is not here stated, was a heavy one, as will be seen from the passages given below. There is no mention in these of any being exempted from the contribution on the score of insufficient means, but in the laws of Edward the Confessor, in that which treats 'de denario Sancti Petri qui Anglice dicitur Rômescot,' it is said: 'Omnis qui habuerit .xxx. denariatas vive pecunie de suo proprio in domo suo, lege Anglorum dabit denarium Sancti Petri.' Further with regard to the time of payment it is enacted: 'Iste (denarius) summoniri debet in festivitate sanctorum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, et ultra festum Sancti Petri ad Vincula non detineatur,' Th. i. 446. So too in the laws of William I: 'Cil ki ad auer champagne xxx. deñ vaillant deit doner le deñ sein Piere,' Th. i. 474. And see note on p. 170. See too the laws of Henry I: 'Romfech in festo Sancti Petri ad Vincula debet reddi,' Th. i. 520. v. Ducange s.v. Denarius S. Petri.]—Wē bebedōp ælcum cristenum men . . . Rômfeoh . . . sǣwel-sceatt, es; m. An ecclesiastical due, to be paid for every deceased person to the clergy of the church to which he belonged, in consideration of the services performed by them in his behalf. It was to be paid before the funeral rites were completed, though the regulation would hardly be carried out in cases where grants of land were made. It appears to have been one of the objects of the early gilds, to provide for the payment of this fee:—Sǣwlsceat vel syndrig Godes lāc dano (donat), Wrt. Voc. i. 28, 44. The passages dealing with the subject in the Laws are the following:—Ic wille ðæt mīne gerēfan gedōn ðæt man āgife ða ciricsceattas and ða sǣwlsceattas tō ðām stōwum ðe hit mid riht tō gebirige, L. Ath. i. prm.; Th. i. 196, 9. Gelæste man sǣwlsceat (sǣwl-, MS. To the same effect it is said in Wulfstan's Homilies:—Eac wē læraþ ðæt cristenra manna gehwylc understande, ðæt hē æfter forþsīde būtan sǣwulsceatte ne līge on mynstre, ac gelæste man ā ðone sǣwlsceat æt openum pytte, 118, 4-7. Sǣwlsceat is rihtast ðæt man gelæste aa æt openum græfe, 311, 12. The sǣwlsceat is sometimes determined in amount by the will of the deceased:—Ic gean into Ælig . . . ðer mīnes hlāfordes lichoma rest, ðara þreō landa ðe wit geheotan Gode . . . and ðes beahges gemacan, ðe man sǣwle mīnum hlāforde, tō sǣwlsceatte, Chart. Th. 524, 14-30. See too Shrn. 159, and Turner's Anglo-Saxons, bk. vii. c. xiv. Kemble; Cod. Dip. i. lxii, remarks that in lands leased by the Church, and exclusively in such, there is frequently a stipulation for the payment of sǣwlsceat. For the practice in the case of gilds, see Chart. Th. 609, 10-18:—Æt ælcum forðfarenum gildan æt ælcum heorpe ænne penig tō sǣwulsceote, sē hit bonda, sē hit wif, ðe on ðam gildscipe sindon; and ðat sǣwulgesceot sceulon ða canonicas habban, and swilce þenisse dōn for hig swilce hig āgon tō ðone.

IV. The word occurs in the passage that defines the distance to which the king's 'grid' extended, but the origin of the phrase, of which it forms part, is not evident:—*Ðus feor sceal beón ðæs cinges grid fram his burhgate ðær hē is sittende on feower heafte his, ðæt is, .iii. mīla, and .iii. furlang, and .iii. æcera bræde, and .ix. fōta, and .ix. scafta munda, and .ix. berecorn, L. Ath. iv. 5; Th. i. 224, 7–10. Cf. Tria miliaria, et .iii. quartene, et .ix. acra latitudine, et .ix. pedes, et .ix. palme, et .ix. grana hordei, L. H. i. 16; Th. i. 526, 15. As the name of a measure of about six inches the phrase continued to exist. Stratmann gives schaftmonde, Nares cites a passage from Harrington's Ariosto in which schaftman occurs; in Ray's Collection (1691) shaftman, shaftmet, shaftment is explained 'the measure of the fist with the thumb set up.' v. also Halliwell's Dict., and Jamieson's, s.v. schaftmon, shaftmont. For the latter form see Sir W. Scott's Antiquary, c. 8 (at the end). [O. Sax. skaft a spear: O. H. III. a, as the name of an English coin the word is found in the form scatt in the laws of Ethelbert of Kent. It is inferred from a comparison of passages in these that the value of the scatt in Kent was one-twentieth of a shilling, v. Thorpe's Glossary. The scatt is also mentioned in the Mercian law, Th. i. 190, 5, where '30,000 scatta' is equivalent to '120 punda.' This would give 250 scatts to the pound. In the Northern Gospels dragmas decem is glossed by 'fif scaettas teásidum,' while the West-Saxon version has 'tyn scyllingas.' If the sums here given may be regarded as equal, the scatt would be worth a West-Saxon penny, the value which it appears to have in the Mercian law. The coin then seems to be of different values in Kent and in the more northern parts of England. [Goth. skatts drápmur, drápmur, mva: O. Sax. skatt money, property, piece of money: O. Frs. skett: O. H. Ger. scaz substantia, mobilia, pretium, lucrum, pecunia, aes, denarius, quadrans, obolus: Icel. skattr tribute.] v. feoh-, fere-, frēo-, geþing-, gif-, mǣn-, mēd-, ofer-, teoþing-, wæstm-scaett; scir-gesceatt.

scilling, es; m. I. as a denomination of English money (uncoined), a shilling. The shilling appears to have been of different values in different parts of the country; in Wessex five pennies make a shilling; Fīf penegas gemacigaþ ænne scillinge, Ælfc. Gr. 50; Som. 52, 8; and with this statement agree several passages of Henry I.'s Laws, e.g. c. 93, § 3, 19, where unus solidus = v denarii, duo solidi = x denarii. In Mercia four pennies go to the shilling. According to Mercian law (Th. i. 190) the ceorl's wergild is 200s., the thane's six times as much, 1200s., the king's, which is six times the thane's, is £120; so that 7200s. = 120 × 240d., i.e. the shilling is four pennies. With this agrees L. W. i. 11; Th. i. 473, where it is said: Solidum Anglicum quatuor denarii constituit. In the Norman time the shilling is twelve pennies. This reckoning seems to be taken in earlier times. v. riht-scilling and Ex. 21, 10. The word is of constant occurrence in the Laws and Charters; from the latter the following passage may illustrate the point that the shilling was a denomination of value, not a coin: Biscop gesalde six hund scillinga on golde, Chart. Th. 90, 21. It also occurs as

scīp-fyllep the private jurisdiction exercised over a group of three hundreds. The word occurs in a charter of Edgar granting to Bishop Oswald certain privileges connected with three hundreds, where in reciting the request that had been made to the king it is said: 'quatinus posset ipse (Oswald) cum monachis suis unam naucupletionem, quod Anglice scyppylled dicitur, per se habere.' The grant of the request is then stated: 'Ego Eadgarus Oswaldus episcopo annuo et dono huius libertatis priuilegium . . . ut ipse episcopus cum monachis suis de istis tribus centuriatibus . . . construant (constituant, Chart. Th. 214) unam naucupletionem, quod Anglice dicitur scyppylled oððe scyppsōne, in loco quem ob eius memoriam Oswaldeslaw deinceps appellari placuit, ubi querelam causae secundum morem patriae et legum iura iure discernantur; habeatque ipse episcopus debita transgressionum . . . et omnia quaecunque rex in suis hundredis habet,' Cod. Dip. Kmbl. vi. 240. The connection between the sense in which the word seems to be used in the charter and the meanings of the two parts of the compound may perhaps be found in the entry under the year 1008 in the Chronicle. It there apparently states, that from every three hundred hides one ship should be furnished to the national fleet. v. Stubbs' Const. Hist. i. 105, and cf. Kemble's Saxons in England, i. 255. The word fyllep occurs in the compound winter-fyllep, q. v.; cf. also Icel. skip-sōkn a ship's crew.

senatus the senate, senators. The treatment of this word in the translation of Orosius is somewhat exceptional. The Latin form senatus occurs in the nom. and acc., but in the former senatas, senatum, and in the latter senatum, senatos are also used; in the gen. senatuses, senatusa are found, and in the dat. senatum; in every case but one (?) the word is plural.

The Latin senator is also used, though the word witan is generally employed to denote the senators:—Sceoldon ealle hira senatus (senatas, Bos. 43, 5) cuman . . . sceoldon hira senatus (-as) rīdan, Ors. 2, 4; Swt. 70, 24, 28. VII. a seeking with hostile intent, an attack. v. hām-sōcn, sēcan, III:—Ic ðære sōcne (the hostility of Grendel) singales wag mōd-ceare micle, Beo. Th. 3558; B. 1777. VIII. as a legal term, frequently in connection with sacu. Kemble says: 'Sōcn is inquisitio, the preliminary and initiative in Sacu, in other words the right of investigat- ing, necessary to and a part of power of holding plea,' Cod. Dip. Knibl. i. xlv. But from a Latin version of a charter it would seem that sōcn was the power of seeking or levying fines; the English 'ic an heom ðæt hý habben saca and sōcna' is rendered by 'cedens ut habeant privilegium tenendi curiam ad causas cognoscendas et dirimendas lites inter vasallos et colonos suos ortas, com potestate transgressores et calumniae reos multis afficiendi easque levandi,' iv. 202, 7. Other instances of the occurrence of the word, whose Latin form is often saca, are the following:—Ic habbe gegeofen . . . Ælfrīne abbod saca and sōcna (sacam et socam, Lat.) . . . And ic wylle ðæt seó sōcne (soca, Lat.) wiðinnen Bichāmdíc liege intō Ramesēge on eallen þingen swā full swā ic heó mēseolf āhte . . . and se abbod and ða gebrōðra intō Ramsēge habben ða sōcne (socam) ofer heom stōc (stoc?). A word occurring mostly in local names, either alone or in compounds. The meaning seems, like that of stōw, to be place (in the first instance perhaps a place fenced in, cf. (?) staca), and both words remain now only as names of places, Stoke, Stowe, or as parts of such names, Basingstoke, Tavistock, Walthamstow. As may be seen from the Index to the Charters, Stōc occurs frequently, some of the references are here given:—Dis is ðara þreora hīda and .xxx. æcera bōc æt Stōce, Cod. Dip. Kmbl. iii. 196, 9: 34, 12. Tō Stōce, 203, 21. Intō Stōce, 123, 8. In loco, qui celebri a sollicitis nuncupatur æt Stōce vocabulo, 19, 32: 33, 27. II. In the following passage perhaps the word is used to denote the quantity of land which could be cultivated with one plough; v. sulincel and cf. plōg. Caruca, which occurs in the passage quoted below from the Laws, seems to have been used in this sense; e.g. in Florence of Worcester's description of the compilation of Domesday Book quot carrucas seems to represent hū mycel landes in the Chronicle; and later sulh is certainly so used, e.g. Ich þe ȝiue þritte solh of loude, Laym. 18779. Seouen sulzene lond, 18789. Twenti sulhene lond, 13176. But the unit of assessment may have been the plough with its team of oxen. v. Seebohm, Vill. Comm., pp. 112–3. sulincel, es; n. A small portion of arable land:—Sulincela aratimacula, Wrt. Voc. ii. 6, 18. v. sulh, II.

Fox 31; Men. 16. [The first part of the compound is of doubtful meaning. Bede says, 'Solmōnaþ dici potest mensis placentiarum, quas in eo diis suis [Angli] offerebant,' but there is no word sol = placenta, unless it be found in the gloss panibus sol, Epinal Glossary, ed. Sweet, p. 21 a, 11. Kluge takes the word to be sōl = sun, and observes 'die form des kuchsens war für die benennung massgebend,' Engl. Stud. viii. 479. Sol = mire would give a name that suggests the later February fill-dyke, and would not be inappropriate. The form sille, selle is found in some L. G. dialects, and also sporkel, which may be connected with spurcalia. See Grimm, Gesch. D. S. c. vi.]

sulung, e; *f. A Kentish word for a certain quantity of land, derived, like carrucata, from a name of the plough; from its origin it might mean so much land as could be cultivated by one plough. From the first two passages given below it would seem that the sulung was equivalent to two hides (manentes), and later a solanda, which is probably the same word, is said 'per se habere duas hidas.' v. Seebohm, Vill. Comm., p. 54. But perhaps it may be inferred that both hide and sulung were considered as on the same footing as regards the plough. Thus to the gebūr with his gyrd laudes, i.e. one quarter of a hide, are to be given two oxen, L. R. S. 4; Th. i. 434, 23, while a gift of half a sulung is accompanied by the further gift of four oxen, Chart. Th. 470, 9–14. v. Seebohm, pp. 138–9, and generally. In the Domesday Survey of Kent the assessment was given by solins, and the word remained in use. v. Pegge's Kenticisms, s.v. sulung:—Aliquam terrae partiunculam, hoc est duarum manentium . . . ritu Cantiae ān sulung dictum, Cod. Dip. Kmbl. i. 249, 19. sumer-lida, an; m. [Lida, like the equivalent Icel. liði in sumar-liði, elsewhere refers to a single object, man or ship (v. lida, sæ-, fð-lida), but in the passage given below from the Chronicle seems to mean a fleet. Later in the same work liþ (q. v.), which seems taken from the Scandinavians, is used in this sense, e. g. ðæt lið ðæt on Sandwīc læg, 1052; Erl. 183, 40, can sumer-lida be intended to represent Norse sumar-lið? In one other place sumer-lida occurs, in company with words relating to the sea, and it there glosses malleolus; but here perhaps sumer-loda should be read, and malleolus be taken in the sense shoot, twig (see spæc); cf. O. H. Ger. sumar-lota, -lata virgultum, palmes. v. Anglia xiii. 330.] A summer fleet, one that sets forth in summer and returns in autumn:—Æfter ðissum gefeohte cuom micel sumorlida (tō Reādingum, MS. E.), Chr. 871; Erl. 74, 35. [Steenstrup takes the word to mean a force moving from its quarters in England, and leaving women, children, and goods behind there; but if Asser may be trusted, the reinforcement was from abroad. He says: ‘quo praelio peracto, de ultramarinis partibus alius paganorum exercitus societati se adiunxit.’] Sumerlida malleolus, hýðscip mioparo, næstcyst modius, Wrt. Voc. ii. 59, 25-27.

[Goth. swē, swa: O. Frs. sã: O. Sax. O. H. Ger. sō: Icel. swā (later svō): Dan. saa: Swed. så.] v. eal-swā.

swāfan (?):—Siō gitsung ðe nænne grund hafas swearte swāfeþ (swāleþ? v. swālan) sumes onlice efne ðam munte ðe nū monna bearn Etne hātap se swefte byrneþ, Met. 8, 46-50. The Latin original has: Saevior ignibus Aetnae fervens amor ardet habendi, which is rendered in the prose version: Manna gitsung is swā byrnende swā ðæt fyr on ðære helle seō is on ðam munte ðe Ætne hātte, Bt. 15; Fox 48, 29. From comparison of these three passages, it seems that swāfeþ should mean burns, while the form of the word suggests comparison with O. L. Ger. suēvōn in berg suēvōt mons coagulatus, with O. H. Ger. sweibōn volvere, ferri, and later English swayne in:—He (the whale that swallowed Jonah) swenge3 and swaynes to þe se boþem, Allit. Pm. 99, 253. All these verbs denote movement, a meaning which does not seem to suit swāfan in the passage where it occurs.

Swāfas, Swāfe; pl. A Germanic people, the Suevi or Alamanni ('um diese zeit (4th cent.) pflegt an die stelle des alten Suevennamens die benennung Alamannen einzutreten', Grmm. D. S. 348), the Swabians:—Swāfas forhergodon ealle Galliam Alamanni Gallias pervagantes, Ors. 6, 24; Swt. 276, 3. Wið norþan Donua æwielme and be eāstan Rīne sindon Eāst-Franca; and be sūþan him and be eāstan sindon Bærgware, se dæl ðe mon Regnesburg hætt . . . Halliwell gives swael, swale to burn.] v. be-, for-, ge-swālan (read -swālan); sām-, unforswāled, swelan.

swām, es; m. A trifler, vain, foolish person:—Swām nugator, inutilis, vanus, Germ. 389, 32. Ic wylle ðæt Latona mōder Apollinis and Diane fram mē gewiten, ðæs ðe Delo ākende, ðæs ðe ealde swāmas gecyðdon (as the foolish triflers of old declared), Anglia viii. 325, 29. Nū mæg hēr manna gehwile gehýran hwet ðas swāmas wæron ðe ure ylðra [n] him tō gebædon now may every one hear in this account (of the gods) what these vain creatures were, that our forefathers prayed to, H. Z. xii. 408, 15.

swāman; p. de To trouble, afflict, grieve. The verb occurs in this sense in later English:—Ofte hit timeð þat tat leoueste bearn sorheð and sweamed meast his calden, H. M. 35, 5. þe engles beoð isweamed, þat seoð hare suster swa sorhfullice afallet, 17, 20. Ure Louerd ne mei uor reoude wernen hire, ne sweamen hire heorte mid wernunge, A. R. 330, 11. þe swemane sorje sojt to his hert, Allit. Pms. 54, 563. Cf. also:—His hert began to melt For veray sweme of this swemeful tale, Lydgate (cited ib. p. 199). Swemyn molestor, mereo; sweem, swemyng or mornynge tristicia, molestia, meror, Prompt. Parv. 482, col. 1. In A. S. only the compound ā-swāman (q. v.) is found, apparently with the meaning to become troubled or grieved. To the instance given under ā-swāman may be added the following:—Swā Sanctus Paulus cwæp ðætte God hēte ealle ða āswāman æt heofona rices dura, ða ðe heora cyrcan forlætaþ God would bid all those grieve . . ., Blickl. Homl. 41, 34. Sceolde se mīn þearfa āswāman (have cause to grieve) æt ðinre handa, Wulfst. 258, 2. Se sceocca sceall āswāman æt ūs, gif wē ānræde beoþ on ūrum geleāfan, Homl. Skt. i. 17, 203. v. swāman.

swāpa, swēpa (-e, -o); pl. Sweepings, in compounds (not inserted in proper place):—Æswāpe (beānscau) quisquiliarum, surculi minuti, Hpt. Gl. 420, 59. Āswāpa peripsema, 504, 3. Geswāpa peripsema, Wrt. Th. 2084; B. 1040. Sweorda lāfe those whom the sword had spared, 5865; B. 2936. ¶ The high esteem in which good swords were held in old times is marked in many ways. Their forging is in many legends said to be the work of other than human hands; so the sword which Beowulf seizes in Grendel's home is ‘eald sweord eotenisc (cf. eald sweord eacen, 3330; B. 1663), ecgum dyhtig . . . giganta geweorc,’ Beo. Th. 3120–9; B. 1558–62; and twice besides occurs the phrase ‘eald sweord eotenisc,’ 5225; B. 2616: 5950; B. 2979; see also ‘enta ðfgeuorc’ applied to the workmanship of a sword, 3362; B. 1679. Cf. too the forging of Sigurd's sword in the Völsunga Saga. They are precious heirlooms, handed down through many years (v. epithet eald above); so Beowulf speaks of his sword as ‘eald lāf,’ Beo. Th. 2981; B. 1488, and the same phrase is used of the sword wielded by one of his followers in the chief's defence, 1595; B. 795. In reference to the sword given by Beowulf to the Dane who had guarded his ship, it is said that the recipient 'syddan wæs on meodobence mādme dȳ wōdrā, yrfeāfe,' 3810; B. 1903; another sword is called 'Hrēdes lāf,' and of it is said 'næs mid Geātum sincmāthpum sētra on swordes hād,' 4389-93; B. 2191-3; and later on mention is made of 'gomel swyrd, Eāmundes lāf,' 5216; B. 2611; Hrunting, the sword which is lent to Beowulf, is 'ān ealdgesceōwa,' 2921; B. 1458. So, too, Byrthnoth tells the Danes who demand tribute of him, that the tribute will take the form of 'ealde swyrd,' used with unpleasant effect upon the invaders. The same point may be illustrated from other than poetical sources. Thus in Alfred's will it is said that he leaves 'Æperēde ealdormenn ān sword on hundteōntigum mancunum,' Chart. Th. 489, 32; in another will is the passage 'Freodmunde fōe tō minum sworde, and āgefe dēret fēower dēnsūda,' 471, 23; another testator bequeathes his sword 'mid dām sylfrenan hylte and done gyldenān fetels,' 558, 10; and another mentions the sword 'dat Eādmund king mē selde on hundtelftan mancūas golde and fōur pund silueres on dān fetelse,' 505, 28. Indeed the sword is often mentioned in wills. The importance of the sword is further marked by its receiving a name. The sword with which Beowulf is armed for his attack on Grendel's mother is named Hrunting, and to the praise of this weapon the poet devotes several lines, Beo. Th. 2914-33; B. 1455-64; at a later period it is with 'Nægling . . . gomol and grægimæl' that he fights, 5354; B. 2680. See, too, Wald. 4; Vald. 1, 3. And elsewhere the same point may be noted, e.g. in the Nibelungenlied, 'daz Nibelunges swert . . . Palmunc was geant;' and this weapon plays a part in the drama to the last scene. In Scandinavian story there is Hākon's sword 'kvernbitr,' which king Athelstan gave him, and Egill has his sword that he called 'Nadr.' See, too, the story of the Cid and the two swords, Colada and Tizona, which he gave to his sons-in-law, the Infantes of Carrion, and which he claimed from them after their unworthy treatment of their wives, Chronica del Cid, c. cclii. Of the value of the sword and of the decoration bestowed upon it, of the shape or colouring, of the make, many epithets and phrases speak. In the Gnostic verses it is said, 'Gold geriseþ on guman sworde,' Exon. Th. 341, 15; Gn. Ex. 126; and 'mādm in heale, goldhilted sword' is mentioned, 437, 27; Rū. 56, 14. See, too, the passages quoted under seolfor-hilt, hilted. In the dragon's hoard are 'dȳre swyrd,' Beo. Th. 6089; B. 3048: the sword which Beowulf seized in Grendel's retreat was golden-hilted, 3358; B. 1677, and 'wæs on dæm sceunum scīran golde þurh rūnstāfas gesæd, hwam dæt sword geworht, irena cyst, ærest wære, wroepenhilt and wyrmfāh,' 3390-3400; B. 1694-8. Beowulf lays aside his 'hyrsted sword, irena cyst,' Beo. Th. 1349; B. 672: he gives a sword 'bunden golde,' 3805; B. 1901: his own sword is 'fāh and fæted,' 5395; B. 2700. Byrthnoth's sword is 'fealohilte,' Byrht. Th. 136, 45; By. 166; and 'gerēnod,' 35; By. 161. Beowulf's Nægling is 'grægimæl,' Beo. Th. 5357; B. 2681: the swords of the Hebrews are 'scirmæled,' Judth. Thw. 24, 38; Jud. 230: other swords are 'hringmæled,' Cd. Th. 120, 10; Gen. 1992: Abraham girds himself 'grægūm sworde,' 173, 22; Gen. 2865: the Hebrews fight 'fāgum swordum,' Judth.
